SUMMARY

The Mount Hope Slave Quarter Ruin is a chimney ruin located in a steep alley between Parkway Place and Cheverly Circle in the Town of Cheverly Maryland. The remains of the chimney are in poor condition and there are no above-ground remains of the structure with which the chimney was associated.

The Slave Quarter Ruin retains very little integrity, as the feeling, association, design, setting, materials, and workmanship are all severely lacking as the site is a ruin and a neighborhood was built around it. The plantation context and its connection with Mount Hope were lost when the Town of Cheverly was built. The integrity of location is high as the site has not been moved and thus may be of good archaeological value.

DESCRIPTION

The Mount Hope Slave Quarter Ruin is located west of 2422 Parkway Place and north of 16 Cheverly Circle behind an unpaved alley between Cheverly Circle and Parkway Street in the Town of Cheverly, Maryland. The ruin consists of a deteriorating chimney surrounded by brush. The chimney ruins are approximately ten feet tall and more than seven feet wide at the base. The chimney is built of rough-cut, iron stone laid in a slightly irregular course and held together by a mix of mortars including the original mortar, as well as modern mortars used for repairs including Portland cement. Larger stones, emulating quoins, run along the corners of the chimney. The original cap of the chimney is missing; however, there is a newer rounded concrete cap over the flue. This cap is also broken. The fireplace opens on the west elevation of the chimney and there are small concrete stepping stones in front of it. There is an iron lintel across the fireplace that was not present in a 1920s photograph. There is a metal bar inside the chimney that may be original, as it was designed to hold hooks for cooking. There are several sets of stacked concrete blocks in the fireplace that are also not original. The chimney is situated on a hill, sloping eastward and is supported under the east elevation by a large stone that protrudes from the north and east elevations. The east elevation was likely the exterior elevation; it has a four-foot-high, two-foot-deep shelf on the east elevation with a stone on the southeast end. The mortar is in disrepair and many of the stones are decomposing. There are no other visible remains of a dwelling and there are no visible marks on the chimney indicating where the walls of the house may have intersected with the chimney.

SUMMARY

The Town of Cheverly, in which the ruins now rest, was once a part of the plantation of Fielder Magruder, Jr., known as Mount Hope. The plantation grew tobacco and other crops. It rested atop a hill, overlooking Washington, DC. Magruder and his wife never had children of their own, so after his death in 1888 and his wife's death in 1894 the plantation of approximately 193 acres were left to Magruder's sister Matilda and her husband Dionysus Sheriff.<sup>1</sup> That land, and neighboring land owned by Sheriff were sold by his heirs to Robert Marshall for the development of Cheverly. As he walked about the property that would become Cheverly, Marshall recalled coming across a slave cabin ruin along a shaded lane, which he believed belonged to the Mount Hope plantation.<sup>2</sup> His assertion was supported by later observers who believed the stone construction was similar to other buildings associated with the plantation, including a dairy.<sup>3</sup>

Cheverly historian Raymond Bellamy conducted significant research on the site from the late 1970s through the early 1990s. The research was inconclusive in determining whether the chimney that remains was actually part of a slave quarters or if it was something else.<sup>4</sup> Due to the size of the chimney, some believe it was a part of an overseers' house from another nearby plantation, while others believe the chimney was nothing more than a backyard barbecue.<sup>5</sup> Although photographs from the 1920s, when Robert Marshall laid out Cheverly, depict the chimney with fallen timbers around it, the exact appearance or construction of the structure, as well as its use, remains a mystery. Furthermore, the timbers in the picture do not appear to be related to the chimney.

If, as the name suggests, the chimney did belong to a slave quarters, then it was likely the home of a slave named Mary Barnes, who was African-American or mixed-race and a widow with eight children. It may also have been the home of a formerly enslaved African American of the Magruders named Henry Hawkins, who was said to have lived near the main house with his wife and six children.<sup>6</sup> As little structural evidence of the past remains above ground or in archival records, it is recommended that an archaeological survey be conducted to investigate the structure and its inhabitants.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Mount Hope Slave Quarter Ruin has historically been associated with the Mount Hope Plantation (HS 69-11) located at 1 Cheverly Circle. The ruins are located approximately 400 feet northeast of the plantation house. The Mount Hope Plantation was the home of Fielder Magruder, Jr., of the prominent Magruder family of Maryland. The 716-acre plantation was established around 1839 by the young Magruder and was home to 15 slaves in 1840, 18 in 1850, and 25 in 1860.<sup>7</sup> There are references to slave quarters on the property in the census records and tax assessments of this era. However, it is unclear if they refer to this structure (69-24-25) specifically. If this chimney was a part of a slave quarters it would likely date to the 1840s to 1860s when the Magruder's plantation and slave holdings grew. The Mount Hope Slave Quarter Ruin is significant because of its value as a part of the development and heritage of the area. It exemplifies the cultural, social, and historic heritage of the County, and has the potential to yield more information about the history of slavery and plantation life in the County, State, and Nation, should an archaeological investigation take place.
